

GALERIE
ALLEN

59 rue de Dunkerque
75009 Paris France
+33 (0)1 45 26 92 33
contact@galerieallen.com
galerieallen.com

COLIN SNAPP

COLIN SNAPP

Born 1982 Lopez Island, USA.
Lives and works in New York and Los Angeles, USA.

EDUCATION

Bachelor of Fine Arts, The San Francisco Art Institute, USA

SELECTED SOLO EXHIBITIONS

- 2018 TC00565718, Galerie Allen, Paris, France
Observatory, Alexander Levy Gallery, Berlin, France
- 2017 Latitudes, Alexander Levy Gallery, Berlin, France
- 2016 Delta, Galerie Allen, Paris, France
- 2014 Jules Marquis, And Now Gallery, Dallas, Texas, USA*
IRND, Galerie Allen, Paris, France
- 2013 National Charter, The Journal Gallery, Brooklyn, New York, USA
TC Studies, Unosunove Galleria, Rome, Italy
- 2012 Lieca Toll, The Journal Gallery, Brooklyn, New York, USA
Continental Drift, The Journal Gallery, Brooklyn, New York, USA
- 2011 Colin Snapp / Daniel Turner, Martos Gallery, New York, USA
Ill Leave You To Your Own Devices, Skylight Projects, New York, USA
- 2010 Community Sculpture Seminar, Jericho Ditch, Isle of Wight, UK*
Good Game, cur. Elizabeth Lovero, Recess Activities, New York, USA
Underneath The Sea, w. Mark Borthwick, cur. Susan Ciancolo, White Box Gallery, New York, New York, USA
Untitled Television Show, South of Town, Brooklyn, New York, USA
Alpine Meadow, ORG Contemporary, Detroit, Michigan, USA*
Ski Lift, Jericho Ditch, Isle of Wight, UK

SELECTED GROUP EXHIBITIONS

- 2018 Future Relics, MOCT, Moscow, Russia
- 2016 True Love Over Physics, COMA Gallery, Sydney, Australia
Tell me what I mean, To _____ Bridges _____, New York, New York, USA
Curated by Etudes, Riviera, Milan, Italy
- 2015 Fifi projects, Mexico City, Mexico
- 2014 Freezer Burn, Hauser and Wirth, New York, New York, USA
Eclat Attraction de la Ruine, Université Sorbonne Nouvelle, Paris, France*
- 2013 Park, Self Titled Space, Tilburg, Netherlands
Zelda Zonk, cur. Timothee Chaillou, Préface, Paris, France*
356 Sculptures, Mission Road Gallery, 356 S. Mission Rd. Los Angeles, California, USA
Christian Rosa/Colin Snapp, Ibid Projects, 4619 W. Washington Blvd, Los Angeles, California, USA
TC 00025617, Family, Los Angeles, California, USA
- 2012 Panorama, Das Odeon, Vienna, Austria
Eagles, Marlborough Madrid, Madrid, Spain
Discovering Slowness, Tranzit, Bratislava, Slovakia
nanomacromega, University California San Diego, cur. Lucía Sanromán, La Jolla, California, USA*
Harold Ancart/Rallou Panagiotou/Colin Snapp, Ibid Projects, London, UK
Its Endless Undoing, Thierry Goldberg Gallery, New York, New York, USA
Den Haag, Gallerie West, The Netherlands*
- 2011 Discovering Slowness, Tabacka Cultural Center, Kosice, Slovakia
The Whitney Museum of American Art, New York, USA*
Flash Light/Festival of Ideas, cur. Nuit Blanche, The New Museum of Contemporary Art, New York, USA*

- Times Square AEO LED Billboard Project, New York, USA*
Festival of Lights: America, KMG, Brooklyn, New York, USA
Cover Version, Brooklyn Academy of Music, Brooklyn, New York, USA
Yautepec Gallery, Mexico City, Mexico*
Wolfe Island, Saint Lawrence Ice, Ontario, Canada*
- 2010 Us and Them, org. Parinaz Mogadassi, Interiors, New York, New York, USA*
Something, cur. Marco Antonini, Pratt Manhattan, New York, New York, USA
Foto>30, Proyectos Ultravioleta, cur. Stefan Benchoam and Gerardo Conteras, Guatemala City, Guatemala
Macys, with Infinity Window, Triple Canopy, Brooklyn, New York, USA*
High Fructose Painting, org. Katie Bode, Sculpture Center/Astoria Walk, New York, New York, USA
Summer Screenings, cur. Daniel Turner, Jericho Ditch, Isle of Wight, UK
Selections from Untitled Television Show, John Connelly Presents, New York, New York, USA
86 Forsyth, cur. Scott Keightley, QVNOXW//, New York, New York, USA
Vessel, cur. Kenya Robinson, Brennan Courthouse, Jersey City, New Jersey, USA
Swipe Country, cur. Michelle Hyun, Add-Art, New York, New York, USA*

*Collaboration with Daniel Turner as JULES MARQUIS

PUBLICATIONS

- 2016 National Charter. Published by Études Books, Paris
2015 ID. Published by Études Books, Paris
2013 Vista. Published by Études Books, Paris
2011 Sydney Jonas Walk. Published by Hassla Books, New York

AWARDS/RESIDENCIES

- 2012 Viennafair artist commissions, Panorama project,
2007 Blue Ridge Trail visual arts residency, Windsor VA
2002/04 San Francisco Art Institute, merit scholarship

LECTURES

- 2012 Viennafair, Vienna Sonic Panel Discussion, September 20.
Maryland Institute College of Art, September 20.
2011 Maryland Institute College of Art, Film Symposium 1, October 22.
2010 Jericho Ditch, Community Sculpture Seminar, September 15.
2006 San Francisco Art Institute, Conversation with George Kuchar, May 8.
2008 Harold Oliver Primary, Color and Field, March 3.
2009/2010/2011 Lopez Historical Society, Panel Discussion, June 10.

SELECTED PRESS

- 2019 Where about now, "Interview with artist Colin Snapp", November 2019
2018 Jeffrey Grunthaner, "Colin Snapp: Observatory at Galerie Alexander Levy", White Hot Magazine, November 2018
2017 Spencer Everett, "New Latitudes: Spencer Everett Interviews Artist Colin Snapp," White Hot Magazine, April 2017
2016 Nicole Kaack, "Colin Snapp: In Conversation with Nicole Kaack," SFAQ International Art and Culture, 5
November 2016
2015 Jeff Grunthaner, "City Limit at the Journal Gallery," White Hot Magazine, May 2015
2014 OSMOS Magazine, Issue 5, pages 46-49, NV Regional, Winter 2014
Interview by ST. Dimitrakopoulos, Kennedy Magazine, Issue 2, pages 10-25, Summer 2014
2013 Etudes Books, "Blue Book no.5", 48 pages, essay by Jeffrey Grunthaner, April 2013
Eine Magazine, "Issue 5", spring/summer 2013

- James Schaeffer, "The Concrete Issue," Nasty Magazine, page 49, autumn 2013
- Jeffrey Grunthaler, "Interview on Jules Marquis," Bomb Magazine Online, February, 19, 2013
- 2012 "Colin Snapp, Basalt," The Journal, Issue 32, pages 120-130, December 2012
- Mariana Botey, Lucía Sanromán, "Engineering and its Reversals: "materials, structures, seeds, aesthetics, cognition," UNWEAVE: pages 53-57, Volume I, Fall 2012
- Kate Abnett, "A Platform for the New Generation," The Vienna Review, page 17 September 1, 2012
- Korhnha Chenna, "Vienna Sonic," The Art Newspaper Russia, Cover page, September 1, 2012
- Jeffrey Grunthaler, "New Directions: The Art of Jules Marquis," C.S. Magazine, pages 12-16 September 1, 2012, ill.
- Andrew Russeth, "Colin Snapp Debuts Video at New Journal Gallery," Galleriestny.com, April 12, 2012
- Sam Cate Gumpert, "Continental Drift," Mono-Kulture, March 6, 2012
- Alison Martin, "Continental Drift," The Examiner, March 26th, 2012
- 2011 "Jules Marquis," The Journal, Issue 31, page 125, December 2011
- Fionn Meade, "Sydney Jonas Walk," Hassla Publishing, edition of 500, October 8th, 2011
- Andrew Russeth, "Colin Snapp and Daniel Turner at Martos," 16 Miles of String, July 29, 2011
- Jacob Brown, "Now Showing Colin Snapp Daniel Turner," New York Times T Magazine, June 30, 2011
- Katherine Krause, "Tin Roof Rusted," Dossier Journal, June 30, 2011
- Interview with Sam Cate Gumpert, "Here and Now," Mono-Kulture, June 30, 2011
- Interview with Kate Donnelly, "Jules Marquis," From the Desk Of, June 29, 2011
- Logan Jones, "Colin Snapp / Daniel Turner," Bullet Magazine, June 28, 2011
- Jacob Brown, "Timely," The York Times Style Magazine, Summer, 2011
- Cali Bagby, "Art From Urban to Rural Life," Islands Weekly, cover pages 4-6, June 8 2011
- "Decade Issue/Classified Ads," An Art Newspaper, May, 2011
- N. Schwarz, "Ao on site," Art Observed, April 22, 2011
- "AbraK48Dabra," K48, Edition no. 8, December, 2011
- Jacob Brown, "Video Exclusive," The New York Times T magazine, January 17, 2011
- Flaunt magazine*, Cover Version, Flaunt Staff, January 2011
- 2010 Katherine Krause, "Skylight projects," Dossier Journal, September, 2010.
- Aron Lake Smith, "Chinatown's long tendrils," The New York Observer, June 2010
- Géraldine Ancri & Emilie Lauriola, "Reel Ten," WOW Magazine, May 2010
- Alexander Wolf, "A tour of LMCC," Art Info, May 2010
- "A Sunday with Susan Cianciolo," Dis Magazine, March 2010
- Interview with Kenya Robison, "The Dialogue," Eyebeam, January 2010
- 2007 Jeremy Snapp, Northwest Legacy, Volume one, October 2007

exhibition view, Latitudes, Alexander Levy Gallery, Berlin, 2017

Sheraton, 2016
video and digital video camera
19 x 37 x 22 cm / duration 60 mins
photo : Aurélien Mole
courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

IRND Platinum/Amber/3, 2016
infrared ND lens filters, 35mm konica print
Image: 65 x 47 cm
photo : Aurélien Mole
courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

IRND Platinum/Sepia/6, 2016
infrared ND lens filters, 35mm konica print
Image: 65 x 47 cm
photo : Aurélien Mole
courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

E.S. Cadillac 2 / E.S. Evinrude, 2014 exhibition view, Tell Me What I Mean, To _____ Bridges _____, 2016 Right : Robert Heinecken
courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

TC Studies, 2013
exhibition view, Unosunove, Rome
courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

Panorama, 2012
video with live sound
VIENNAFAIR, Odeon, Vienna
courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

Panorama, 2012
Video still, video 16:9, sound
37 minutes
courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

Deluxe Automatic, 2013
Video Still, multi channel video, sound
2 minutes, 9 seconds
courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

TC00025617, 2013
archival ink jet print, glass, pedestal 122 x 183 x 18 cm
courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

TC00035511, 2016
c-print
177 x 115,5 cm
courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

TC00105902, 2016
c-print
177 x 115,5 cm
courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

ND Studies #5 & ND Studies#4, 2017
exhibition view, Latitudes, Alexander Levy Gallery, Berlin, 2017
courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

Leica Toll, 2012
exhibition view
The Journal Gallery, New York
courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

Leica Toll, 2012
Video Still, 2 channel video, sound
8 minutes, 2 seconds
courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

Glass Study 1 - 3, 2012
exhibition view,
Ibid Projects, London
courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

GALERIE
ALLEN

Glass Study 1, 2012
c-print
183 x 117 cm
courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

National Charter, 2013
exhibition views,
The Journal Gallery, New York
courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

NV Regional, 2013
Video Still, 16:9 video, sound
90 minutes
courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

National Charter, 2014
exhibition view, Freezer Burn, Hauser and Wirth, New York Foreground : Daniel Turner
courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

IRND Coral 1-2, 2014
Infared ND lens filter, 35mm konica print 63 x 44 cm (framed)
courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

National Charter, 2013
Archival Pigment prints on cotton rag paper
104.8 x 71.1 cm
courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

GALERIE
ALLEN

59 rue de Dunkerque
75009 Paris France
+33 (0)1 45 26 92 33
contact@galerieallen.com
galerieallen.com

PRESS

whereaboutnow.com

Where About Now - Colin Snapp

David Elsche

12-15 minutes

Where About Now Where do our questions reach you?

Colin Snapp I just finished a month-long artist residency in Italy. It turned out to be an ideal situation for me and I'm grateful for the opportunity. It was exactly what I needed. I was finally able to have the time and space to complete some works that I've been meaning to finish for several years now. Additionally, I discovered some incredibly interesting locations that will play a key role in an exhibition I'm having in June. I'm currently in Paris for the week to start mixing an archive of field recordings I've been compiling for five or six years now.

Continental Drift 32°, Site specific weather report, Hurricane Ridge, WA, 2014

WAN Your photographs and videos deal with the American landscape as subject and, in a metaphorical sense, as representation for a society. What is it about the American landscape that captivates you?

CS I was born and raised in the U.S., it's the landscape that I know best. The sparseness, the banality... The gradient of the American populous. A shopping mall can exist as a church just as easily as a landscape for consumption. The re-framing of the mundane or routine normalcy as not something to diminish but something to celebrate. The ritualistic nature of suburban America. All of these contradictions fascinate me. America is a dying empire yet in a representational manner it is as powerful as ever. The U.S. is what I know, it's my heritage yet simultaneously I've always felt very disconnected from American culture and values. This feeling of familiar disconnection can be difficult however at this point it's become the perfect recipe for my vision and the artistic language I work to create... An outsider in one's own homeland. This is my reality. I'm trying to be as constructive as I can be with the sense of distance and isolation that I live with. Objectivity has always made sense to me and this becomes obvious when viewing my work.

Where about now, Interview with artist Colin Snapp
November 2019

Observatory #1 Digital print on rag paper 112, 76 cm, 2018

Observatory #3 Digital print on rag paper 112, 76 cm, 2018

WAN Related to this theme of landscape, much of your work also recalls, for us, the themes and promises of the great American road trip. Do you have a preferred mode of travel in this sense, and how does the way you travel affect the work you produce?

CS I did go on road trips as a child, yet because I grew up on an island I spent more time on sailing trips. Also, the Cascade mountain range was adjacent to the islands so I spent a lot of time hiking as well, often for weeks at a time. I remember seeing no other hikers on these trips. It was always such a strange experience when you came across another human. In terms of a preferred mode of travel I would have to say walking. Going on long walks has inspired my artistic sensibilities more than any other mode of transit.

WAN How do you decide on destinations to travel to and how do you prepare yourself for a new destination?

CS I decide on the locations I travel to in two ways. One is spontaneously coming across subject matter in my everyday life or travels that speak to me to the point that I feel compelled to make work about a certain location or phenomenon. The other is a more planned approach, in which I will take months to research a project or gain clearance to a site of interest. In terms of preparation for a trip, I have no set routine to create a work. It's something that needs to happen naturally and can't be forced. Also, every project is always such a different experience from the previous one. Over the years, I have learned to be more patient and not to have expectations or assumptions about how things are going to go.

Exhibition view, "Latitudes", Alexander Levy Gallery, Berlin, Germany, 2017 courtesy the artist and alexander levy, Berlin, Germany

Setra 215 Tour bus windows, powder coated steel, 100cm x 700 cm x 7cm 2018

WAN As you travel so much for work, we are curious, do you also travel for pleasure? And if so, where and how? Do you ever travel without your camera?

CS I rarely travel for pleasure and I always have a camera of some sort on me.

What type of camera does not matter to me. It can be an iPhone or a VHS camcorder or a disposable camera. The technology is irrelevant. It's hilarious to me how caught up people get on the technology of it all and the type of camera, or filter or brand of lens. I have made some of my best work on the most random equipment. As long as I have something to document with, I am fine. I suppose this is what separates an artist from a technician.

WAN A large theme in your work also seems to be the mediation of experience, be it through the (video)camera itself or via installation (a line of bus windows bifurcating the gallery in some of your recent shows). The tourism industry, with its pointed, specific view of individual destinations, can also be seen as a tool to mediate experience. How do you think about tourism and modern travel in your work?

ND 4 ND 5 Fine art inkjet prints 175 cm x 113 cm, 2018

Sony index #1 chrysanthemum Digital c print 175 cm x 113 cm, 2019.

CS I am interested in revealing how we see and experience at this point in time and how these notions are constantly evolving. I choose to focus on the banality of the Modern Travel experience and in particular guided forms of travel within nature. Working within a more pastoral backdrop/setting allows for subtleties. It's one thing to see a tour group within an urban setting and it's another to see this within a national park. For instance when I witness someone taking a photograph in Times Square - it's not interesting to me, however when I witness this same action happen in the forest - it becomes much more profound. To use nature as a blank slate to focus on these modern gestures and ways of observing.

In some facet or another, ritualism is at the core of all my work. The ritualistic nature of travel is particularly interesting to me. I choose to focus on locations that act to highlight this. My film Nv Regional is perhaps the most straightforward example. It's a 90 minute film portraying a mass of tourists ascending and descending a hillside on the backside of the Hoover dam. These tourists are walking to a viewpoint to see the dam, yet the actual dam is never revealed. The viewer only sees a steady stream of tourists who seem to be on some form of pilgrimage. In a sense it could be filmed anywhere. By not revealing signs or known landmarks my work focuses on processes and movements, rather than actual locations. My work is about looking at something that is considered banal or mundane and reframing it to create a new meaning. I consider the basic act of taking a photograph as one of the most ritualistic things humans do.

Colin Snapp IRND Platinum/Amber/3, 2016 infrared ND lens filters, 35mm konica print

Colin Snapp IRND Platinum/Amber/3, Detail 2016 infrared ND lens filters, 35mm konica print

WAN Cameras themselves are also often visible in your photos; and in today's culture of selfies, visitors often photograph themselves in front of the art at exhibitions and publish it on social media. What is your view on this endless cycle of photos within photos?

CS I just finished a film I shot in Rome that addresses exactly that... endless cycle. The notion of taking a picture of someone else taking a picture is normal in today's visual lexicon, yet even a few years ago it could have been considered conceptual or an intellectual action. Instagram changed everything in the way we visually relate to each other. It's made text and literature seem almost irrelevant. More than ever people are starting to realise that a picture is worth a thousand words but if you are repeatedly bombarded with that same picture it will mean absolutely nothing in barely anytime at all. Instagram is dead. It is a post-Instagram world... I am so thankful I have never participated in any social media. It has pushed my creativity in alternative ways to stay relevant and to have an audience for my work. This being said, I don't condone social media, as obviously it's helped millions of people. I just hope that people will wake up a bit and realise its effect. Just like anything it's important to be aware of your actions, especially if you are an artist.

National Charter, 2014 exhibition view, Freezer Burn Hauser and Wirth, New York courtesy the artist and Hauser and Wirth.

Observatory 2018 Exhibition view, alexander levy Gallery, Berlin courtesy the artist and alexander levy, Berlin, Germany.

WAN Photography (and especially travel photography) is closely linked to memory. How do you think the people you depict would react if they discovered themselves in your work?

CS I like that question a lot. I think they would be confused at first and then excited and then confused again. I mean I'm so objective in the manner that I film. It is like I am invisible, these people have no idea they are being filmed. But the intent and treatment of the footage is not making someone look bad or good, it is just showing things how they are. It is important for me to make artwork that does not come across as condescending. What I do is simple. It's just about taking a different viewpoint on things people do not notice, yet experience daily. My hope is that the frame of view I am presenting will help create a new type of awareness as well as openness.

NV Regional, 2013-2018 Video Stills, 16:9 video, sound 90 minutes courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris.

NV Regional, 2013-2018 Video Still, 16:9 video, sound 90 minutes courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris.

WAN The figures you depict are often in the distance where the sharpness of the image decreases. How do you play with the idea of blurriness in your work?

CS Video stills were the first still images I started printing. I would re-photograph these stills to be able to print them at a larger size. This layering aspect is something that I have never deviated from. Whether it's shooting through tinted bus windows or camera LCD screens, I am always working within the distortions of layering. The individual has never been my main focus. It is the collective human experience that interests me. I prefer not to show things that are crystal clear. I like the idea of not knowing if something is digital or analogue or if it was shot in 1996 or 2020. I have a certain visual sensitivity that allows me to do this. It is important that I take great care to keep certain things vague.

By limiting reference points I am able to steer people's eye towards things that are simultaneously familiar and new to them.

WAN Could you imagine showing your work on site where it was taken instead of in exhibition rooms?

CS Most certainly, the white cube is just a foundation to build a visual language. Ideally to the point that this artistic language is so defined and incorporated by all it can be presented almost anywhere in any medium and continue to be understood as well as built upon.

Setra 240 / 242 Tour bus windows, powder coated steel, 120 cm x 675 cm x 4 cm 2015

WY Regional, 2014 Two channel video, sound 12 minutes
courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris.

WAN What are you working on right now and when and where can we see your next exhibitions?

CS I am working on quite a few projects at the moment. Most notably a book titled National Charter. It is based on a photo index of corporate logos and emblems throughout the United States. I've been working on it for over a decade and it's become a very personal anthropological survey at this point. I am really excited to finally conclude this project.

Additionally, I am shooting a series of short videos that focus on the relationship between iconic LA gang signs and the similarities these gestures have to the way iPhones and cameras are positioned and held, especially when used to take a picture. Lastly, I am halfway through directing a feature length film based on ritualism within the malls of southern California. The next exhibitions, I'm working on, are both in June. One of the exhibitions is heavily audio based and is taking place inside a number of historic glass greenhouses. These greenhouses are part of an ancient botanical garden in Siena, Italy. The other project next year will take place in Serbia as part of the Belgrade biennial.

NOVEMBER 2018 - "THE BEST ART IN THE WORLD"

Colin Snapp: Observatory at Galerie Alexander Levy

Colin Snapp, "Observatory" (installation view). (All images courtesy of the artist and Galerie alexander levy).

Colin Snapp: Observatory

Sep 15, 2018 - Nov 3, 2018

Galerie alexander levy (<https://alexanderlevy.de>)

Rudi-Dutschke-Strasse 26

D-10969 Berlin

By JEFFREY GRUNTHANER, NOV. 2018

Similar to how the works of certain artists might be described as “mixed-media,” one can describe the artistry of Colin Snapp as “mixed perspective.” Working primarily in film and photography, Snapp strategically documents how people conform to ritualistic patterns of conduct. He captures distant figures observing ordinary cultural mores like walking, standing still, or photographing a pleasant landscape. The significant difference is, in Snapp’s work, these behaviors are deprived of any visible purpose. Families gathered at a national park, for example, might come off looking like lemmings: an endless flux of some unidentified, yet uniform mass disappearing at the edges of the frame, as though falling off a cliff. Along with this, the mediating borders of the camera’s lens become an awkward presence, denying the observer any pretence of clear-eyed objectivity.

I had the opportunity to interview Snapp regarding his most recent body of work, delving into subjects like ritual, cultural identity, and the pervasive anomie of Western society.

Jeffrey Grunthaner: Can you speak about the methodology behind the images you’re presenting? They have the aura of images captured by a security camera, but nothing is found footage, correct?

Colin Snapp: Yes, that's correct. None of the work in the show was appropriated. The images were created using a variety of methods. Many were taken through natural filters such as tinted windows. I then rephotographed them off a video camera LCD screen. This gives the images a faded or worn-out quality. By using hi-fi cameras to create lo-fi images I’m essentially bypassing the cameras original intent and creating something that is inherently unique. The average person spends a significant amount of time perceiving the world through some form of layer or another. If im going to document the world in a way that's at all contemporary, then I need to consider how it's currently being experienced and make works reflective of that experience.

JG: I'd like to talk about the way you re-present expansive, natural sites in the context of a white-walled gallery. Why do you chose to present your works framed (or on TVs), rather than in another way (say, pinned to a wall or projected)?

CS: It has to do with the architecture of the space. Much of my work is indexical and series based; and I often use traditional techniques such as frames and pedestals. My practice is site-specific, and I really enjoy the challenges that artistic presentation requires. I've become increasingly interested in exhibiting in a variety of settings. I recently exhibited a film at a concert venue in LA in front of three thousand people. A month earlier I screened that same film on a billboard in rural Washington state with just a handful of people. I cant say which screening was more successful. But I did learn a lot from both presentations — as each one highlighted different qualities of the movie.

Colin Snapp, "Observatory" (installation view). (All images courtesy of the artist and Galerie alexander levy).

JG: Showing in European galleries, do you see your work as introducing non-Americans to the fissure and faults inherent in American life? Do you think you could do the reverse — maybe develop a critique of European society within the context of an American gallery?

CS: That's something I often think about. I prefer to create my art in the US, but exhibit it in Europe. America is what I know and what I feel comfortable talking about in any depth. I'm sure I could make some interesting work in Europe, but it would be from the perspective and mind of a tourist. In the US I feel I can work with more complexity, and actually study tourism while not being one.

Colin Snapp, NV Regional (2013 - 2017), HD video still.

JG: Let's talk more about tourism. On the one hand, given the contingency of your birth, you are more familiar with Western and mid-Western landscapes than most. On the other, these places were explored and known to native American peoples long before there was any such thing as "America." Do you think it's somehow fundamental to the American experience to be a perpetual tourist? At home but never truly at home?

CS: I wouldn't say it's only fundamental to the American experience. I think you can go anywhere in the world and find people that don't feel like they fit in and are perpetually adrift in their own country. This is even more the case when you look at how we travel and navigate the world. The infrastructure of modern travel is set up in a way that makes it difficult to experience culture in an in-depth manner. There always seems to be a layer of separation. Cruise ship travel and packaged bus tours are perhaps the most obvious example of how superficial and distant we have become from the places we visit.

Colin Snapp, NV Regional (2013 - 2017), HD video still.

JG: Perhaps more of a comment than a question — but could you talk about identity in your work? I find it striking that groups of people you capture, perhaps because they are tourists, are often reduced to facelessness, always in the midst of repetitive movements or gestures, like participants in a ritual they don't understand. Does ritual play a significant role in your work?

CS: In some facet or another ritualism is at the core of all my work. The ritualistic nature of travel is particularly interesting to me. I choose to focus on locations that act to highlight this. My film Nv Regional is perhaps the most straight forward example. It's a 90 minute film that portrays a mass of tourists ascending and descending a hillside on the backside of the Hoover dam. These tourists are walking to a view point to see the dam yet the actual dam is never revealed. The viewer only sees a steady stream of tourists that seem to be on some form of pilgrimage. In a sense it could be filmed anywhere. By not revealing signs or known landmarks my work focuses on processes and movements, rather than the actual locations. My work is about looking at something that's considered banal or mundane and re-framing it to create a new meaning. I consider the basic act of taking a photograph one of the most ritualistic things that humans do.

Colin Snapp, "Observatory" (installation view). (All images courtesy of the artist and Galerie alexander levy).

JG: Are you currently working with new footage or materials similar to what you presented at Alexander Levy? Are there any new directions you're hoping to go in?

CS: Yes, I'm currently working on several new projects I'm excited about. The first being a film about the spiritual nature of malls in America. I'm also working to create a sculpture exhibition with the trash and detritus left behind on Mount Everest. I would like to start focusing on more extreme forms of tourism, such as mountaineering and diving. WM

Vault Spoiler Alert
text Sammy Preston
July 2017

ESSAY

SPOILER ALERT ON INSTAGRAM AND THE ART WORLD

Instagram has become an indispensable tool for artists, curators and gallerists but how is it affecting our visual literacy in the process? VAULT weighs in.

By Sammy Preston

"All that was once directly lived has become mere representation," wrote Guy Debord in his 1967 Marxist-leaning treatise on modern life, The Society of the Spectacle. He described a dystopian sort of world, subsumed in a frenzy of technology and images – a not-so-far-fetched prophecy for our digital age. Since the camera obscura and its earlier niche iterations, the practice of photography has proved to be an incredible and unwieldy power: a mystic technology to shape and shift our experience of reality and our perception of memory, gently tending to the more violent flames of our imagination and our deep-rooted, universal ego.

Ten years after Debord, Susan Sontag published On Photography, a series of seminal essays on the superficiality of visual material and the idea that photographs "enlarge our notion of what is worth looking at." Sontag, whose sentiments on snap culture are ever-relevant, argued that the practice destroys the richer currency of our visual literacy: it impoverishes the world of artistic intellect, obstructs our ability to present, and is at its most damaging when applied to the arts.

Over three decades before the arrival of Facebook, Instagram and the social media photostream, Sontag reasoned "to photograph is to appropriate the thing photographed" and that the mass medium of the camera has become "the ideal arm of consciousness in its acquisitive mood." For the activist, photography was a militant arsenal, a mass art form but not especially artistic, "a compliment mediocrity pays to genius" and "a tool of power."

So, we can imagine that Susan Sontag would have criticised social media and the 2010 arrival of Instagram which saw life and art viewed through the Nashville filter. But might she have been side-stepping the greater medium of our age? And what is the true value of Instagram – along with its tendency to spark visual saturation – for artists, gallerists and the wider art world?

Executive Director of ArtSpace in Sydney, and curator for the Encounters sector of Art Basel in Hong Kong, Alexie Glass-Kantor (@alexieglass) Instagram tagline wryly plucks from Sontag's prose: "today everything exists to end in photograph #sontag". In Hong Kong for Art Basel in March this year, Glass-Kantor was called to argue for the motion in an Intelligence Squared debate that asked, is social media killing art? She and teammate British artist Ryan Gander (@ryangander) supplied a captivating case, with Glass-Kantor pitching social media's seven abominable offences against art.

As well as skewing our perception and short-changing us of the real nuances beyond the screen, Glass-Kantor highlighted the grave difference in sum between artists' pockets and those of global conglomerates like Facebook (who purchased Instagram in 2012 for US$1 billion). According to January 2017 statistics from the National Association of Visual Arts (NAVA), 64 per cent of Australian artists earn less than $10,000 from their creative work.

Though, debate aside, Glass-Kantor happily admits, "I love Instagram. I majored in photography at art school and I love images. Instagram for me has been a great platform for reminding me about why images matter." Last year, CNN included Glass-Kantor in a listicle titled 'The world's most beautiful Instagram accounts to follow'. For the most part, she's wary of the episodic and public tender of the platform, and of the fallacy in discrediting artists' work in simple point-and-shoot reappropriation. But as a curator, Glass-Kantor sees Instagram as a useful cataloguing tool, a powerful publishing mechanism, and perhaps a curious connecting muscle for the arts not yet properly flexed.

Just moments after the Intelligence Squared debate, Glass-Kantor and ArtSpace launched 52 ARTISTS 52 ACTIONS. The online project, which will begin to play out in September, asks artists across Asia to address local social and political issues such as the refugee crisis and mass migration. The year-long initiative exists publicly almost solely via Instagram – artists are allocated a week, and given access to the @52ARTISTS52ACTIONS Instagram account.

"Because [Instagram] is led by images, you can speak in a cross-cultural format," says Glass-Kantor. "You can allow for a level of immediacy to content, without having to ship works. You can create works for that space that can actually speak to an accumulative audience in a different way. It's pretty amazing."

For Paris-based curator and director of Galerie Allen, Joseph Allen Shea (@galerieallen), reinterpretation and representation, while potentially damaging, is an inevitable end point for art and part of its necessary communication and reception. "Art can be funnelled, filtered, and cropped but only if that is a format that can carry or aid art," he says. He points out that "destructive misrepresentation of art" can happen from many different reasons outside the digital realm: in a gallery it might be a bad hanging, bad lighting, or a multitude of real world distractions. My point is that the digital space isn't the problem, it is in human error or alternative agenda."

As with any media, perhaps it's key to pay mind to the agenda of art on Instagram. The company itself employs its own Visual Art Director (Kristen Joy Watts, @kjoywatts), and has heralded hashtag campaigns like #Empty to excite and connect art enthusiasts and art museums. Initiated by Dave Krugman, an influencer and expert in online communities, the #Empty movement began in 2013 and featured magnetic, shareable photographs of institution interiors after hours – The Met, The Royal Opera House in London, and eventually, MONA in Hobart. "The visual aspect of Instagram makes it possible for people to interact in a more meaningful way," Krugman told The Guardian in an interview two years later. Arguably, #Empty made art less exclusive, and inspired renewed thirst for visual discovery.

For Ramesh Mario Nithiyendran (@rams_deep69), Instagram is a part of the contemporary artistic vernacular, a subconscious and integral part of his practice, even his artistic brand, and a reality of art communication right now. "I'm pragmatic. I understand that most people will encounter an artwork on a screen before they have the chance to view it in person, and I have no value judgment associated with that," he says. For The National exhibition at Carriageworks in Sydney, Nithiyendran's towering neon pink phallus was "kind of made for Instagram traction."

Of Allen Shea's stable, New York-based artist Colin Snapp doesn't use Instagram. Snapp's work directly addresses screen culture and the notion of creating value within an image, specifically digital imagery. He sees a problem with carving individuality in the digital realm. "Personally, the importance lies in the separation... how can an artist that uses digital media define their own visual language?" he asks. "Instagram or Facebook can and have been incredibly beneficial to many artists. Yet, it can also cheapen the intent. Cheapen the outcome. I prefer to share fewer images that carry weight than an abundance of images that don't. It's certainly very thin line though."

Brisbane-based artist and lecturer in visual media at Queensland University of Technology Daniel McKewen admits he does "occasionally post image-observations or jokes, and carefully cryptic updates" on his own work-in-progress, but he is wary of revealing work that simply won't connect as poignantly online as it might in reality. "This is mostly because I'm a private person, my studio process is similar, and the artwork I am currently making isn't really about social media. A real bodily sense of spatial and temporal experience is difficult to convey through a screen. This makes some art necessarily a real-life proposition."

Then there's also the issue that too much exposure on Instagram in the lead-up may reduce anticipation of a show. But it's hard to argue that these limitations outweigh the benefits: the ability to self-publish, the freedom to scroll and share anywhere anytime, for lengthy conversations about art to take place across oceans. As Allen Shea puts it: "Digital technology has limited some experiences. [Despite this] it should not stop us from questioning these channels or making time for looking at art objects unhindered by the fitness of screens." ■

SONTAG, WHOSE SENTIMENTS ON SNAP CULTURE ARE EVER-RELEVANT, ARGUED THAT THE PRACTICE DESTROYS THE RICHER CURRENCY OF OUR VISUAL LITERACY: IT IMPOVERISHES THE WORLD OF ARTISTIC INTELLECT, OBSTRUCTS OUR ABILITY TO PRESENT, AND IS AT ITS MOST DAMAGING WHEN APPLIED TO THE ARTS.

Susan Sontag
On Photography

On Photography by Susan Sontag

Top to bottom, left to right
COLIN SNAPP
Photographer Aurélien Mole
Courtesy the artist
and Galerie Allen, Paris
Instagram account
of Daniel McKewen
Instagram account
of Ramesh Mario Nithiyendran
Courtesy the artists

OSMOS Colin Snapp NV Regional
 text Cay Sophie Rabinowitz
 Issue 05 Winter 2014

STILL MOVING STILL COLIN SNAPP

COLIN SNAPP NV REGIONAL

NV Regional, filmed at Hoover Dam, on the border between Arizona and Nevada, is a ninety-minute single-channel digital video capturing the constant stream of tourists as they traverse a terraced walkway. Their single goal is to reach a viewpoint adjacent to the dam, where presumably they will take pictures and return, traveling along the same route in reverse. Many do, in fact, carry cameras.

In the visual narrative, animated figurative shadows of the visitors vary over the course of the day according to the sun's path, which is the only detail in Snapp's film that embodies difference. The seemingly endless procession of people plodding up and down steep switchbacks appears to be in an otherwise desolate location. Without the sun to indicate time of day this durational situation remains entirely atonal.

As we watch the video, an incessant hum in the background becomes evermore distinct. The sound is recorded noise emitted from power lines located at the parking lot of the visitor center; it is the score to this journey. The production stills from NV Regional featured in this issue of OSMOS Magazine demonstrate a determined repetition inherent to the managed site, as well as the effect of repetition as a conceptual device employed by the artist.

Absent this information however, the travelers in their surroundings appear otherworldly, like religious disciples on a desert pilgrimage. Like much of Colin Snapp's work, NV Regional acts to transform key destinations within America's middle class from the mundane to the monastic.

46 ALL IMAGES: Film Stills from NV Regional (2013)

INTERVIEWS

COLIN SNAPP: IN CONVERSATION WITH NICOLE KAACK

Colin Snapp, IRND Platinum/Amber/4, 2016. Infrared ND lens filters, 35mm konica print. Image: 65 x 47 cm

American artist Colin Snapp uses his work to reflect upon a cultural fascination with image that haunts the very structures of our lives. In film, photography, sculpture, and installation, Snapp captures the architectures, such as tour buses and brands, that mediate and reduce our lived experience to a series of static images. In recent projects such as the video NV Regional (2013) and the photographic series "National Charter," Snapp has explored the strange meeting point of authoritative order with natural beauty. Snapp speaks with NYAQ's Nicole Kaack on the event of his concurrent exhibitions at Galerie Allen and FIAC in Paris.

Colin Snapp, Delta, 22nd September, 2016 – 29th October, 2016, Galerie Allen. Photo: Aurélien Mole

Nicole Kaack: "Delta" can signify many things. It is the mathematical symbol for change, but it is also the term we use to describe that sedimentary no-man's-land at the mouth of a river as it turns into several. Why did you choose this name for your exhibition at Galerie Allen?

Colin Snapp: I decided to title this exhibition "Delta" for several reasons. I was first exposed to the word while flying with the American airline Delta, so I've always associated it with air travel rather than a mathematical or geographical reference. I've always been interested in typography as well as the subtleties of visual marketing, specifically corporate logos. Much of my work acts to re-frame the notion of what a logo stands for and how the imagery of what a brand represents is constantly in flux. The Delta Airlines insignia is a logo that I've always been attracted to. Additionally, I like the non-specificity of the word Delta. For one person it can bring to mind geometry—specifically, a triangle in the Greek sense—for others perhaps fraternity culture or the ending point to a river. The title Delta doesn't directly address any specific work in the show but, in an indirect way, alludes to all the works. For me there is certain poetry with the title as it leaves space for interpretation yet simultaneously speaks of my interest in modern travel, geography and the nature of branding.

Colin Snapp, Sheraton, 2016. Video and digital video camera, 19 x 37 x 22 cm / duration 60 mins. Photo: Aurélien Mole. Courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

Your title sort of preempted my desire for profundity in a word, a single serving of eloquence. I love that your experience of the word "Delta" is both the capitalist dream and the defeat of the intent behind the branding. In a kind of circular reasoning, they name the company "Delta" to suggest that what they sell is both pure and natural, but when your first experience of the word is as this consumer experience, the intent is somewhat reduced. This is not to say, of course, that those words have been voided of the classical connotations. Maybe that is part of it: producing a non-word that nonetheless holds multiple meanings. Would you say that, in this manner, the title is almost a filter for the entire show?

Yes, I agree with you completely. I'm quite intrigued by the fact that a word that represents a corporation often becomes more powerful than the definition of the word itself. Also, it's important for me to give a somewhat ambiguous title to an exhibition that, by its nature, is quite conceptual. The thought of using a title as a crutch to express the full idea of an artwork has never appealed to me.

There is a certain kind of loneliness to the way that you photograph nature in the IRND series. I think this emerges from the sepia tones of the IRND filter, which draws ties between the images you choose to capture and shots taken by early travel photographers like Félix Teynard or Gustave Le Gray.

The IRND series came about as somewhat of an accident. While filming a video in Nevada, several of these filters broke due to the wind. It became obvious to me that I needed to make use of these "artifacts of production." Initially I thought to frame just the fractured filter but after some time I realized it was more interesting to create assemblage works with these filters. In turn, the series has become a way for me to portray not only elements of my filmmaking process but also address the larger frame work of my practice.

Colin Snapp, Delta, 2016. Charter bus windows, tint, and powder coated steel, 456 x 111 x 5.5 cm. Photo: Aurélien Mole. Courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

Transparency, as a technique of literalizing an already-mediated gaze, is present throughout your work. Your images of tourists in parks demonstrate a cultural enthusiasm for the image on the screen that exceeds interest in the reality on the other side. Would you speak about this in relation to the new window sculptures and IRND prints presented in Delta?

The infrastructure of travel contains divisions that dictate perspective as well as experience in a general sense. For instance, if one person is a passenger on a bus or plane looking through a window with a cyan tint they are going to interpret their surroundings in a different manner than a passenger who views these same surroundings through a window with a yellow tint. The IRND series act to address this phenomenon in the simplest of forms as they show a single landscape photograph through two different fields of color. The charter bus window sculpture is similar in terms of creating a piece that confronts these notions of perception yet it varies in the sense that it also acts as a barrier and form of constraint. The basic principle I'm addressing with this sculpture is that a person can exist within a location or culture but not actually engage within it. It's a piece that originated out of a Leica Toll, a film I made in North Africa where I spent a month living within packaged tour groups. The majority of my time was spent witnessing the countryside from the contained perspective of bus windows. I shot the entire film from this limited vantage point.

Creative Sugar Colin Snapp Exhibits at Galerie Allen in Paris (continued)
text Jeffrey Grunthaner
July 2014

Colin Snapp, IRND Platinum/Amber/2, 2016. Infrared ND lens filters, 35mm konica print. Image: 65 x 47 cm. Photo: Aurélien Mole. Courtesy the artist and Galerie Allen, Paris

You also choose to distance or dwarf the image further by placing it in a much larger canvas. Can you talk about that compositional decision?

The choice to place a small object in a large frame is a way for me to draw attention to the filters. I prefer to think of these filter assemblages as historic artifacts. Artifacts derived from a personal experience yet presented almost as though they are sacred objects in a vitrine. The compositional decisions as well as the framing are influenced by these notions.

That is interesting. I definitely see the vitrine space, in the sense of presenting an object as testament to narrative, but also in the form. The way you isolate the assemblages in an expanse recalls the way such articles are presented in museums. The move from horizontal to vertical is also important though, because as viewers we have to look forward, outward, towards the object. It is the reorientation from the working object plane to the perceptual, lived one. In thinking about experience in this way, framing it for us to look at, what do you hope to bring to your viewer? Do you have an agenda or do you hope for a freer response?

I like what you're getting from these works. It's definitely in line with what I was after. However, there is no specific agenda with the presentation. Rather the framing and installation decisions are the results of studying many framing methods throughout the years and then inventing new ways to incorporate a more traditional technique. Devising a new framing style to best articulate each series is important to me. I had the frames for these assemblages constructed in the manner that I felt was best suited for these exact filters and their relationship to the bus windows and gallery space as a whole.

Can you speak further about the FIAC Tour Bus project? Much of your work seems to deal with the mythology of "coming back to nature," and your travel projects have wandered the United States' countryside. For this project you are twice divorced from regular subject matter, displaced to France's urban environment. How does this different structure change the intentions of the project?

That's a really good question. As an American it has always felt natural for me to make work about America—it's what I know. I believe the subject matter of my native country is something I can work with in a more honest way than that of a region I don't have roots in. That being said, I've always been attracted to the idea of exhibiting in a context foreign from or distant to that in which the work was constructed. Charter buses and tour groups in general are fairly ubiquitous throughout the world. Meaning that, in this instance and for this specific installation, the context isn't so important. Paris is essentially the modern capital of tourism, so, in a way, it's a perfect project for the Tuileries Gardens, which are central to the most visited sites in the city. Yet, in another sense, the fact that the bus will exist out of its routine environment and within the confines of a garden is quite interesting to me. It's possibly the perfect fit, albeit not specifically American and not specifically addressing a national park but still removed from a comfortable zone. This form of re-contextualization is what feels important; whether performed in Europe or America is beside the point.

TAGS:

COLIN SNAPP	CORPORATE CULTURE	DELTA	DELTA AIRLINES	FELIX TEYNARD	FIAC BUST TOUR	FILTERS
GALERIE ALLEN	GEOGRAPHY	GEOMETRY	GUSTAVE LE GRAY	INSIGNIA	IRND	LONELINESS	NEVADA	NICOLE KAACK
NORTH AFRICA	PARIS	PASSENGERS	PHOTOGRAPHY	TRAVEL	TUILERIES GARDENS	VIDEO

(<https://whitehotmagazine.com/>)

ADVERTISE (HTTPS://WHITEHOTMAGAZINE.COM/DOCUMENTS/ADVERTISE) RECENT (HTTPS://WHITEHOTMAGAZINE.COM/NEW)

CITIES (HTTPS://WHITEHOTMAGAZINE.COM/CITIES) CONTACT (HTTPS://WHITEHOTMAGAZINE.COM/DOCUMENTS/CONTACT)

ABOUT (HTTPS://WHITEHOTMAGAZINE.COM/DOCUMENTS/ABOUT)

MAY 2017 - "THE BEST ART IN THE WORLD"

New Latitudes: Spencer Everett Interviews Artist Colin Snapp

Colin Snapp, Left to right: ND 2, 175cm x 113cm; ND 3, 175cm x 113cm; and ND 1, 175cm x 113cm. (Installation view), courtesy of Alexander Levy gallery.

New Latitudes: An Interview with Colin Snapp

By SPENCER EVERETT, APR. 2017

Colin Snapp is a videographer and photographer currently based in Berlin. Snapp's work offers up something like an alien eye that documents the strangeness of our outdoor pastimes—and their attendant media—as they assimilate into the camera's frame and calcify into ritual.

His new show in Berlin, Latitudes (Alexander Levy (<https://alexanderlevy.net>), Feb. 25-Apr. 15) is interested in how spectacular landscapes—specifically the dramatic vistas and rugged trailheads of the American west—are processed and re-purposed into pathways, plaques, staircases and infographs. Bereft of their touristic majesty, sites like the Hoover Dam or Yellowstone National Park become, through Snapp's eye, reflections of our common will toward comprehension and ease. And yet the territory remains quietly unstable and mysterious.

2017-5-26

WM | whitehot magazine of contemporary art | New Latitudes: Spencer Everett Interviews Artist Colin Snapp

Work by Colin Snapp

Part fine art photographer, part forensic anthropologist, Snapp composes a record of the cultural histories we create until, devoid of iconicity, our routinized playgrounds become unfamiliar. Seeing Snapp's photography in Latitudes, I'm reminded of one of Chris Marker's closing remarks in Sans Soleil: "I've been around the world several times, and now only banality still interests me."

Spencer Everett: Of course the road trip isn't unique to the U.S., but its associations to the American idiom are strong nonetheless. Did you go on a lot of road trips, growing up off the coast of Washington State? What do you feel is your work's relationship to their promise—fulfilled or not—of adventure and individual liberty?

Colin Snapp: I did go on road trips as a child, yet because I grew up on an island I spent more time on sailing trips. Also, the cascade mountain range was adjacent to the islands so I spent a lot of time hiking as well. Often for weeks at a time. I remember seeing no other hikers on these trips. It was always such a strange experience when you came across another human. These experiences had a large influence on the way I learned to associate with what "America" means to me, in both a rural and civic sense. This became apparent once I started spending time in the more "iconic" parks of the west. The infrastructure that's been constructed within many national parks is very methodical, almost abrasive amongst these supposed settings of "nature". Parks such as Yellowstone or Yosemite are considered remote and even wild yet at this point in time they mirror an amusement park rather than something pure or natural. This example of mediated or rather dictated experience has always fascinated me and definitely impacted the artwork I create.

2017-5-26

WM | whitehot magazine of contemporary art | New Latitudes: Spencer Everett Interviews Artist Colin Snapp

Colin Snapp at work.

SE: To my knowledge, this is the second of your recent shows to employ a line of long, tinted bus windows that sort of bifurcate the gallery (Setra 215). I feel they not only provide a view from the tour bus, so to speak, but also operate as a filter, in reference to the photographic medium. Would you discuss their return in the new show? Are they a cordon? A threshold? A viewer's functional guide through the space?

CS: Yeah, you're right, these sculptures are very much connected to the assemblages I construct using camera lens filters. However, I'm also envisioning them as a commentary on tourism and modern travel in general, as well as in line with many of the minimal earth works from the 60s. And perhaps in a formal sense the work of Donald Judd or Dan Graham: a sculpture (ie contextualized object) that seems very basic in principle but reveals the complexity of both the concept and material when seen close up close. I'm currently working on several new sculptures and performances/interventions that address what "nature" means to the American public at this point in time, and how our relationship to it is constantly evolving.

Colin Snapp, Left to right: ND 5, 175cm x 113cm; ND 4, 175cm x 113cm; Setra 215, 100cm x 700cm x 9cm. (Installation view), courtesy of Alexander Levy gallery.

SE: Your photography in the past has captured still shots from video. Is that practice continued here?

CS: I'm thinking of photography as a way to sketch rather than a means to an end. Film, video, performance and even sculpture have always been my primary interest. I still work with video stills as objects/prints. In both a historic and aesthetic sense there is a definitive difference between printing a still from a video or film and printing a photograph. I like working within this line. I tend to shoot my own images yet I don't have an issue working with appropriation or collage. I've always felt that the idea is the most valuable aspect. The tools, materials, and process tend to be secondary. The conversation between analogue vs digital / film vs video seems so antiquated to me—and this notion certainly translates to the prints I produce.

SE: Elsewhere, you've described the "condensed geography" of Europe as something at odds with your work. In contrast, can you describe your work's attraction to the American western expanse? What interests you about civic life as patterned across such sparse terrain?

CS: I was born and raised in the US, it's the country I'm most familiar with. The sparseness, the banality, framing the mundane as ritualistic... The gradient of the American populous. A shopping mall can exist as a church just as easily as a landscape for consumption. The contradictions that define America fascinate me. It's a dying empire yet in a representational manner it's as powerful as ever. In terms of Europe: it's very intriguing to me in many regards yet artistically I don't feel much inspiration there. It makes too much sense to me, it's too quaint. That said, I'm sure this could change if I just spent more time working and investigating the continent. The US is what I know though, it's a country that I feel comfortable in yet simultaneously very disconnected from. I believe this familiar disconnection can be the perfect recipe for my vision and the projects I'm working to achieve. WM

Études

Home | Collections | Books | Studio | Store | About

Conversation with Colin Snapp

October 16th, 2013

Throughout his particular artistic approach used for his different projects, Colin Snapp works as would a researcher. His work confronts the evolving relationship between travel and perception. The publishing of a book around his series Vista (TC studies) seemed for us a great opportunity to collaborate. Our common idea was to create a statement art book, an artwork in itself.

I spent a few days in LA for the book signing and installation at the Family bookstore. During the same time Snapp opened a show with the British gallery Ibid Projects, in a temporary space in the city, and was also working on a group sculpture show at 356 S. Mission Rd.

Colin Snapp would say that the itinerate aspect of his working process is what he treasures most. The following interview is the result of a couple of conversations that will help understand his work and the character behind it.

Your work clearly derives from your art making practice that mostly takes place outside. How do you re-construct this process, when you bring your work into the interior sphere, such as your studio or a gallery? How important are these interior spaces for you? How do you organize your time between these contrasting environments?

I don't necessarily need a studio and in a certain regard I prefer the freedom of not having one. For the most part my artistic process is based on the trips I take. The reason I keep one is to have a consistent space to show work and to maintain a sense of structure. The open ended nature within my practice can be daunting at times so a structured space is helpful. Yet in terms of planning for an exhibition a studio isn't crucial as it's essential for me to create a show that takes into account the unique aspects of each venue.

For me, some of your work that includes human's presence is related to movement or slow shifting bodies. How we as humans cohabit with each other? Are you at all interested in dancing or the human movement in general?

In a broad sense I'm interested in dance, yet specifically I would say I'm interested by certain subtleties within human movement, especially on a more subconscious level. That being said this fascination has developed over time and grew out of an interest in Landscape cinematography. Early on I realized that in order for me to create accessible content I needed to include humans or at least elements of human presence. This is partly why I'm so responsive to create video work that blurs the line between documentary and performance art.

When we drove together in LA, we mostly listened to Top 40 radio, you said it was working perfectly with the landscape. How do you select or make sound for your videos? And what is your interest in music?

I grew up playing the guitar and piano and this has had an impact on the way I construct and relate to my films and videos, so it's always been an important factor for me. Recently I have been driving a lot and this has changed the way I relate to music. Tuning into the most popular local radio station helps me integrate into a certain environment...in LA this happens to be the top 40...and yes it seems to make sense here, yet in another city or environment I might be listening to something else. In terms of my video work, the soundtrack is a very important aspect and often I spend more time on the audio than the video. I'm always making recordings and over the years I've created an extensive audio archive. While editing the footage I sort through this archive and decide what audio will fit best where. It's a very basic approach yet the more minimal the soundtracks become the more symbiotic they are.

You first started by making videos, and more recently photography. How do you combine or separate these practices. Is your approach different? How would you decide if a location could work in a picture or in moving images?

Yes, I spent over a decade working with film and video before I started thinking about still imagery as a viable medium for me to work with. This interest in photography came with the realization that my work belonged in an art gallery not at a film festival. Over time my videos became shorter and shorter and naturally a still image is the shortest length for a video. My video work is very specific and can at times go months without filming anything. Photography is a way for me to sketch, to stay active. I'm still not comfortable thinking of myself as a photographer though...yet if it's under the pretense that I'm deconstructing aspects within the film making process it seems to make more sense to me.

I would say that there is something very cinematographic in your photographs, do you agree with that?

Yes, definitely.

I read about the idea of the "photographic eye," do you look more with your intellect or with your aesthetic senses? And how do you think this adds different perspectives?

I look with both equally. It's a constant back and forth. For instance everyday I see things I would like to film or photograph yet I restrain myself. This restraint is the first form of post production/editing. I always question why I would like to capture certain images...if I wouldn't then I would end up with an over abundance of material. I often think about what gives my content value and part of this is to shoot less and revisit the material more.

NV Regional, single channel digital video loop, TRT: 90:00, dimension variable, 2013

NV_Regional (sketch1) from Colin Snapp on Vimeo.

Optic filter, lenses, noise effects, screens obscurations and light projectors are recurring elements in your work, what interests you in using these?

Video stills were the first still images I started printing. I would re photograph these stills to be able to print them at a larger size. This layering aspect is something that I've never deviated from. Whether it's shooting through tinted bus windows or camera LCD screens I'm always working within the distortions of layering.

Why do you often obstruct the camera lens when you are shooting photography or video?

Études Conversation with Colin Snapp (continued)
text Études
October 2013

The average person spends a significant of time each day looking through screens or filters, whether it's a windshield, a computer screen or sunglasses all of these have an impact on the way we perceive and this impact is more often than not overlooked. I'm interested in producing recreations of the modern vision and to not address the layered abstractions within this vision doesn't seem honest or even relevant for that matter.

Furthermore, I am fascinated by the idea of using what I have learned from after effects programs such as Photoshop or Premier to inform the actual taking of a photograph or filming of a video. There is a lot that can be done with in-camera editing / lens obstruction or, filter experimentation and this aspect of production seems to be neglected. The reason for this is a dependency on after effects. I'm not denouncing Photoshop. However, the idea of using it as a resource rather than a tool seems more relevant now than ever.

Something peaceful, quiet or meditative mixed with a form of hidden violence emerges from your work, is it a reaction to the number of images produced nowadays and the possible aggression that can emerge from it?

This aggression stems from a reluctance to adhere to the perfection that technology strives for. The organic nature of painting and sculpture has always fascinated me, but the bulk of my practice is locational and logistically these mediums never made sense. The sheer precision of today's digital cameras is amazing yet for me it's always been important to intervene and create work that is both technologically progressive yet simultaneously flawed. I don't believe this is a question of nature vs technology or digital vs analog but a question of how these ideas can coincide. The arguments of whether a certain format is better or whether a certain medium is better than another one are gone. These discussions are arbitrary at this point. It all comes down to how good of an editor you are and this pertains to all mediums.

People asking about the role of the artist, or the artist questioning himself about his ultimate goal. Do you often think about this and do you have any answers? Do you have a personal goal that you would want to achieve?

Yes I think about this a lot and I do feel a sense of duty. I realize that much of my effect as an artist comes from the way in which I live my life and maybe has less to do with the actual work. Ultimately I hope that my work is individualistic and will help to bring about new ways of seeing and thinking. However because things are becoming so interconnected the notion of individual has become extremely complex. The idea that as an individual artist you can reinvent the wheel almost seems absurd. The collective influence is the new individual influence, and at times this can be frustrating.

You are working on a series based on the environmental aspect of corporate logos, signs and advertisements. What is your favorite logo?

It's difficult to pick just one but among my favorites are Westfalia, NBC, Sheraton, Kodak and Rolex

Observing the observer, photographing the photographer, placing into abyss is an important aspect in your work, your position is somewhere in between the surveillance camera that is just there to archive time and the observer, who analyses facts and acts? Is that how you consider your position?

I was raised on a remote island in the Pacific Northwest and as a child I would rarely leave the island. So naturally I have always felt an aversion to society. This has not always been easy, and because of this I have always felt more at home as an observer and not a participant. This perception has instilled in my practice a strong objectivity that at times can feel more akin to anthropology than art. Although at this point in time the definition of an artist is so loose so to consider my position as an artist almost seems irrelevant.

Can you more specifically talk about the Vista series, which we published this year?

Last summer I was commissioned by Vienna Fair to produce a video project based on the US national park system. I chose to implement Yellowstone National Park with a mapped surveillance system. The majority of the material ended up being of park visitors taking photographs. Through the influence of observing this surveillance footage I came up with the idea to re photograph nature imagery off of various video camera LCD screens. Vista is a collection of these photographs.

Modern tourism, bus tours, groups, what does your practice reveal about the actual world and the time we live in?

I'm interested in revealing how we see and experience at this point in time and how these notions are constantly evolving. I choose to focus on the banality of the Modern Travel experience and in particular guided forms of travel within nature. Working within a more pastoral backdrop/setting allows for subtleties to become more apparent, it's one thing to see a tour group within an urban setting and it's another to see this within national park. For instance when I witness someone taking a photograph in times square it's not interesting to me however when I witness this same action happen in the Forrest it becomes much more profound. To use nature as a blank slate to focus on these modern gestures and ways of observing.

Do you ever want to pursue the work of certain artists? You told me you were mostly interested in Land Art. What about Ed Ruscha, Robert Frank, Jeff Wall or Andreas Gursky to just name a few?

A certain influence seems inescapable and I can relate to Ed Ruscha's indexical approach and to a certain extent Robert Franks' book The Americans. Yet photography/the history of photography is something I've never been concerned with. Land Art, and sculpture are mediums I'm more consumed by. In part because I primarily work amongst natural landscapes but also because of the vastness within land art that's always seemed to contain a limitless potential.

Do you feel close to an American art tradition or is there also a European influence in your work?

I do feel close to an American art tradition and actually feel very lucky to be working as an American artist today. I can't say I feel much of a European influence.

You recently moved from NY to LA, what does LA have to offer that NY doesn't?

It offers me access to a wider range of environments.

Installation views, 1/9 Unosunove Contemporary, Rome Italy 2013

Études Conversation with Colin Snapp (continued)
 text Études
 October 2013

We talked about the fact that working with exterior spaces is primordial; again you are confronted with the notion of space when you show your work in a gallery. How do you translate outdoor space to print, video or sculpture and then ultimately to the exhibition space? What would be the perfect installation environment?

That's a good question and I'm not sure I can give an exact answer. This idea is something artists seem to have struggled with for a long time. The earth works of the 1960s brought this discussion into the limelight where it's remained ever since. I think about this often, specifically how I can progress these notions through my own practice. In an obvious manner this can be done with the subject matter of an image or object but ultimately a photograph or a sculpture is not enough. With time based work it's a more of a seamless transition just by the multi-sensory nature of the medium. Ultimately though, I've always been most drawn to artists who address actual experience as the work its self. I'm thinking of people like Richard Long and Tehching Hsieh. In regards to the perfect installation space I'm not sure there is one. To a degree Jericho Ditch has been ideal.

Leica Toll, installation view, The Journal Gallery, NY, 2012

For many years you worked in collaboration with Daniel Turner under the name Jules Marquis, together you opened Jericho Ditch, a white cube gallery in a barn in Virginia, where you curated shows. Can you tell me more about this relationship, and what this allowed you to do that you might not have been able to do on your own?

I started collaborating with Daniel in 2001 while we were attending the San Francisco Art Institute. These works were presented under the name Jules Marquis and were a way for us to make art that didn't deal with the same regulations we opposed upon our own practices. This collaboration has given me a lot of freedom and helped inform my own practice. Jericho Ditch was similar in the sense that it allowed me to experience what it's like to run a gallery. These collaborative experiences have helped me realize the importance of working spontaneously and ultimately helped me create a more well-rounded practice. Collaboration is an essential part of being an artist, as is knowing when to compromise or not. Learning this distinction is invaluable.

Panorama, (production still) single channel digital video, TRT 47:23, 2012

Panorama, installation view, Odeon, Vienna, Austria, 2012.

Panorama (excerpt) from Colin Snapp on Vimeo.

You are working on a 90 minute feature that focuses on a fixed shot of tourists traversing a terraced walkway at the Hoover Dam, Nevada. Can you explain the work process you had to go through and the idea behind this video?

Yes, NV Regional. The video documents visitors as they ascend and descend the switch backs of a handicap ramp on the backside of the Hoover Dam. The ramp is cut into the hill side in such a way that it recalls the switchbacks of a mineral mine or the terraced slopes of an Aztec form. The relationship between tourism and industry or work and leisure is at the core of this video and the repetitive nature of the piece acts to highlight this idea. From afar these visitors look as if they are part of a factory assembly line however with closer inspection one can tell these are tourist from within America's middle class. The soundtrack is sourced from electrical currents. These recordings were taken at one of the Hoover dams' many power stations. The video consist of a 90 minute fixed shot and contains no edits. I've been using industry standard cameras and anamorphic lenses in order to create a more traditionally cinematic feel. I haven't finished the project yet as there have been so many obstacles with the location...from high winds to legal issues it's been a tricky location. At the same time the challenges keep this project interesting, I believe it will be a place I will always return to.

You have filmed in Middle Eastern countries and in the US, how opposed are these two regions culturally and in an environmental sense? How are you putting these two places in a dialogue? You like to travel, what is the importance of culture and countries?

Culturally the two regions are extremely different...however the tourism industry is quite similar. The main reason for this the popularity of the guided tour largely popularized by the Chinese as a result of government regulated travel. I'm not so interested in the specifics of a given country or its relationship with another...I'm more concerned with the ways in which travel industries dictate experience and perception. For instance while working in North Africa I filmed entirely from the inside of tour buses. These thick tinted windows became the ideal screen for me to convey a sense of separation that has become so pervasive.

Gallerist Colin Snapp Debuts Video at New Journal Gallery in Williamsburg on Saturday
text Andrew Russeth
December 2012

Gallerist

Happenings:
This Week in
New York

Reviews of Current Shows

Like 7.7k
Follow

PREVIEWS

Colin Snapp Debuts Video at New Journal Gallery in Williamsburg on Saturday

BY ANDREW RUSSETH | 4/12/12 2:29PM

Like 0 Tweet 0 Share Pin It submit Email

Installation view of "Leica Toll" by Colin Snapp. (Courtesy the Journal Gallery)

Has there ever been a stranger time for young artists? Their work may not be selling at quite the clip of 2007, we're told, but their opportunities are greater than ever. The risks they face are too. New galleries are opening regularly, and the established ones, sensing competition, are expanding. These art dealers need artists, and they have plenty to offer them.

The Journal Gallery, on North 1st Street in Williamsburg, is one of the many galleries ramping up. The exhibition venue of the luxe magazine The Journal, founded by Michael Nevin, has long been a sterling project space, a purveyor of handsome, modestly-sized shows by artists established elsewhere—Joe Bradley, Michael Williams, Rita Ackermann and the like—as well as a number of unknown artists well before their prime. Now it represents two superb young artists: Daniel Turner and Colin Snapp, who sometimes collaborate on a project called Jules Marquis. More artists may be on the way.

On Saturday, Mr. Snapp, 29, will unveil a quietly impressive video installation at a new Journal Gallery space on North 1st, a bit closer to the East River. It's in a former warehouse, with high ceilings and 3,500 square feet for artists to work with. The artist has lit it with a two-channel, 10-minute video spliced together from footage shot during a month-long trip to Morocco, called Leica Toll, and nothing more.

It was nearly pitch-black inside when we visited on a sunny Wednesday morning, along with Mr. Snapp, Mr. Nevin and the gallery's Vita Zaman, formerly of the Pace Gallery in New York and IBID in London, and it took some time for our eyes to adjust. As they did, deep, rich bells peeled out from speakers, sometimes gently, sometimes with a loud clang. Mr. Snapp recorded them in Morocco and then slowed them down. They echo through the empty warehouse and almost seem to make it vibrate.

Scenes from Morocco's roads appear on screen, which Mr. Snapp shot them through the window of taxis while riding along them. Huge tour buses slide slowly, silently past. A woman, shot in a rearview mirror, shields herself from the camera with her hand. There are expansive, empty desert landscapes. It never quite adheres to a documentary format—the clips are too quick, too disjointed—but instead balances between narration and raw imagery. The viewer becomes an intimate tourist in Mr. Snapp's world.

Over at the original Journal Gallery space, just across Bedford Avenue, Mr. Snapp has another show on view, through April 29. This one is called "Continental Drift," and it is almost as spare as his video installation—a few brightly lit snapshots from Morocco made on a disposable camera (sand rendered his other camera unusable) and a photo of that woman's hand, enlarged to an unsettling size. He projected the video onto the wall of his studio and took a photo. Skip the video installation down the street, and it will appear almost abstract, certainly illegible.

In the smaller gallery's office on Wednesday, Ms. Zaman was sitting with Journal Gallery co-founder Julia Dippelhofer. Why the new space? "These two amazing artists," Ms. Zaman answered, referring to Messrs. Snapp and Turner. "Their work is so major that it requires the space." Mr. Nevin had his eye on the space for a while. The gallery will renovate it over the summer and make a grand debut in September with a solo show by Mr. Turner.

Such large, Chelsea-sized spaces are still rare in Brooklyn, but Ms. Dippelhofer noted that there are a number of warehouses, some empty, in the area and all along North 1st. "This street just seems like it could be perfect," she said. "A lot of things are happening. You can really feel it."

Update, 5:30 p.m.: An earlier version of this article incorrectly attributed the closing quotation. It was spoken by Julia Dippelhofer. In addition, the article has been clarified to note that the gallery is expanding, not moving fully into the new space.

CONNECT WITH US

Sign up for our Newsletter

SEND

Send an anonymous tip

SEND

RECOMMENDED FOR YOU

Werner Herzog Doesn't Like Art, and Other Tales From the Whitney Biennial Op...

Took a Little Trip to Mexico: Collector Eugenio López Inaugurates Mexico C...

Promoted Content by Taboola

Popular on Gallerist

Ways Forward: What's Next for the Dia Art Foundation?

Philippe Goes to Hollywood: With Vergne In Place as New Director, L.A. MoCA Looks to the Future

Art History According to George Clooney

They Clicked With Investors—Now What? Who Will Win the Race to Sell Art Online?

Rene Ricard Has Died

Creative Sugar Colin Snapp Exhibits at Galerie Allen in Paris
text Jeffrey Grunthaner
July 2014

About Show Calendar Contact Us Print Issues Creative Videos Shop

CREATIVE SUGAR

VISUAL PERFORMANCE FASHION CULTURE

SOCIAL NETWORKS

MUST READ

09/03/2014, 7:41 PM

La Mujer es Mi Religion: The Jessi Wapi

BY EMILY WEST

Jessica Sabogal is a first generation Colombian – American graffiti

Read more...

09/03/2014, 7:32 PM

Perfect Sinner – Fashion Editorial

BY SHERRY JONES

Photographer: Jonne Johnson
Stylist: Sherrah Jones Hair/Makeup: Model: Clara Rae

Read more...

CATEGORIES

- Culture (7)
- Fashion (12)
- Performance (4)
- Visual (21)

ARCHIVES

- September 2014 (5)
- July 2014 (1)
- June 2014 (4)
- April 2014 (6)
- March 2014 (7)
- December 2013 (1)
- October 2013 (4)
- September 2013 (1)
- May 2013 (2)
- March 2013 (13)

LIFE STYLE

La Mujer es Mi Religion: The Jessi Wapi

Jessica Sabogal is a first generation Colombian – American graffiti

Home / Visual / Colin Snapp Exhibits at Galerie Allen in Paris

07/28/2014, 9:05 AM NO COMMENTS

Colin Snapp Exhibits at Galerie Allen in Paris

Credits, photos courtesy of artist and gallery.

photo 1: Exhibition IRND 27th June – 27th July, 2014, Galerie Allen

photo 2: Exhibition IRND 27th June – 27th July, 2014, Galerie Allen

photo 3: Deluxe automatic, 2013, 4 channel video, 2 minutes, 9 seconds, Ed. of 3

Jeffrey Grunthaner: For your recent show at Galerie Allen in Paris, titled IRND, you exhibited three bodies of work: the TC Studies, Deluxe Automatic, a four channel video work, and IRND, a collection of Lens filters. Why these bodies of work? How do they relate?

Colin Snapp: I've always been drawn to the methods of film production. I have a degree in filmmaking and ever since university I've been thinking about these methods more critically. These three series all deal with the breakdown of the camera, the breakdown of modern perception. They came to me at different points in time. The video, for instance, Deluxe Automatic, I shot in 2009. It's essentially footage that zooms in and out on film studio lights. The multiple channels of the video create a pulsating effect that acts to give new life to these objects. It's an ode to behind-the-scenes aspects within film production. At the time, I didn't do anything with the material because I hadn't yet created a certain conceptual language the piece could work within. In 2010 I started working on TC Studies, a large-scale print series of LCD camera screens. The thematic is always botanical in order to address nature's role within these evolving technologies. The filter works came about when I was shooting a film in Nevada and the wind knocked the filter off the camera and it fractured. This accident ended up creating the perfect emblem for the production itself.

I wanted things to be very concise with this show. I put a few pieces from each series together to create a multifaceted approach to a similar idea, in which the evolution of technology dictates how we see and how we experience. Essentially this exhibition is about forms of perception, bringing these different tools to light in different ways. One series wouldn't have been enough, it was more dynamic with three.

JG: Did the gallery space itself affect how you presented the work?

Yes, always. It took me a while to figure out the exact install, but the show ended up being quite effective. There was all these layers in the way I hung it. I had to do a lot of planning for this. It's a five-year grouping of work that had no place for before — works which are quite intimate. So, in this instance, exhibiting in a smaller space was helpful.

JG: Has your perspective on these three series changed now that you've presented them all at once?

CS: Yeah I think so. For my next project, for instance, I'd like it to be very simple and just exhibit one massive sculpture: the entire side of a four bus, a found object that connects the themes of tourism/the modern gaze that are in this show. But everything will be presented in a different manner here. I like the idea of going back and forth: between exhibitions that are very conceptual, multifaceted, and ones that are more straight forward, matter-of-fact. I think a more recognizably sculptural exhibit will be an ideal follow up to the Galerie Allen show.

JG: Tell me more about Galerie Allen. How did your show there come about? Are there any similar galleries in Paris?

CS: I published an art book with Eusebe Books — Vista — and they liked it and I got an email. Pretty natural.

Galerie Allen has been around for about a year. Their goal is to make it a space that cultivates institutional interest — an educational platform of sorts. They seem to be trying to change the notion of what a gallery can be: figuring out ways to circumvent the need to sell work, getting governmental funding to do off-site projects, linking up their artists with shows that are outside the market.

I think in general there's more opportunities for artists to show in institutions, foundations and museums in Europe than in the case in America. Just by default I would say European galleries have more of a connection to these types of venues. From what I could tell there's just a few major Parisian galleries that seem to get all the attention. There doesn't seem to be quite the same DIY gallery culture that exists in other cities. It's a tricky location to open a new gallery in; smaller galleries tend to get overlooked. In New York there's a more room for the middle of the road, the middle ground.

Paris is also more traditional in the way it approaches art and artists. It seems that the collectors there are reluctant to buy works without thoroughly getting to know an artist's practice, whereas here it's considered normal for collectors to buy an art work purely as an investment.

And the audience Galerie Allen cultivates seemed really receptive to this exhibition. Did you read the Arstlant review? James Loks brought to light this notion that these are concept-based works, but they still have this gravity that makes them aesthetic. You can enjoy them. And that's definitely something I've always sought for.

ARCHIVES

- September 2014 (5)
- July 2014 (1)
- June 2014 (4)
- April 2014 (6)
- March 2014 (7)
- December 2013 (1)
- October 2013 (4)
- September 2013 (1)
- May 2013 (2)
- March 2013 (13)

City Limit at The Journal gallery

Thomas Struth Audience 13(Galleria Dell'Accademia, Florenz, 2004 Chromogenic print 72 7/8 x 118 1/8 x 2 1/2 inches (framed)

City Limit
curated by Colin Snapp
The Journal Gallery
Mar. 19 - May 3, 2015

By JEFF GRUNTHANER, MAY 2015

"City Limit," showing at the Journal gallery through May 3rd, marks the curatorial debut of Brooklyn-based artist Colin Snapp. Rooted in Snapp's own practice, the photographs gathered in the exhibition occupy a crepuscular realm between documentary realism and imaginative transformation. The raw material that serves as the substrate for this dialectic is nothing less than space itself: space reified as a commodity, in terms of which people are directed to behave in certain ways. Essential to the show, however, is the manifestation of space as something that transcends ritualistic codes of conduct. Capturing outlying regions of daily experience, such as suburban shopping malls of the 80's (photographed by Michael Galinsky), space becomes eloquent as an enviroing potential shaped by history but not limited to its laws. This mingling of inevitability and freedom echoes themes in Snapp's own art, so I inquired into the formal structure of "City Limit," and how it relates to the sense of mediation that pervades the show.

Jeff Grunthaner: As an artist with a highly developed film and photographic background, I'm wondering how the works gathered in City Limit reflect your own work, or if they do at all?

Colin Snapp: The works I chose for "City Limit" do reflect my own practice. The degree in which they do this, however, varies from piece to piece. The most obvious connection between my own work and that of the artists in the show is the value placed on the exploratory. Many of the artist in the show, for instance, keep a studio, yet I wouldn't consider them studio artists. For the most part, these artist are utilizing travel and exploration as a way to engage ideas on a more spontaneous level -- a level that's not as easy to control or manipulate as, say, an artist with a more studio-based practice. This certain spontaneity -- and the back and forth/contrast between outside space and inside -- is at the core of the exhibition.

JG: What criteria guided your selection of works for the show?

CS: Selecting the works for the show ended up being a very natural process for me. At first the criteria were quite open ended: I just made a list of works that I was drawn to, works that somehow stuck with me throughout the years. Once I had this list, I started using the commonalities between the works to put together a thematic thread. I started thinking about why I was drawn to these images, what it was about them that made them so memorable.

I realized the two main attractions for me were the story or idea behind the image, and the aesthetic or temperament the image exuded. The exact criteria aren't easy to describe. This being said, apart from a couple of logistical complications due to time constraints, the show ended up being very calculated. If I ever curate in the future, however, I'll include sculptural and performative elements.

JG: The bulk of the works in "City Limit" are highly analogue, in that they're by and large (with the exception of one or two pieces) the products of film being exposed to light. Why did you choose to show filmic work, over more digitally altered pieces?

Michael Galinsky, Malls Across America #2, 1989 (printed 2015), Inkjet print, 20 3/4 x 31 inches (framed)

CS: I have no strong allegiance to film, video or photography -- or even the particular histories of these mediums. These technologies are mere tools that allow for a certain flexibility that would be unattainable with another medium. I felt it was important to choose works that convey this notion, as I believe its a common ideology shared by the artists in the exhibition.

In a general sense, I'm attracted to a more raw or degraded image quality. But for the exhibition I really didn't give any thought to digital vs. analogue; and at this point in time the debate between the two seems antiquated. I like playing with the slippage of old and new technologies. Its something I address a lot in my own practice. I love how certain works in the show that look the most filmic are in fact digital.

JG: What's the significance behind the title of the show?

CS: In the broadest sense the show is about civic and pastoral divisions, or the divisions between the woods and the suburbs. The peripheries or the outliers/suburban escapes of a city are also central to the show. The limitations of a city both geographically and psychology are key factors in many of the works. I like using the metaphor of taking an Amtrak train out of an urban center into the wilderness. The gradient of humanity this experience evokes has always captivated me. The title "City Limit" made sense as it speaks of these themes but is still open for a certain amount of interpretation.

JG: Some photos, like Robert Smithson's, capture a place wholly removed from urban or suburban transit. How does the theme of land art tie in with the exhibition as a whole?

CS: In one facet or another, every work in the show is linked to the idea of a divided landscape. I felt it was important to include some images that document various seminal land art works or sculptural interventions within a specific environment. The inclusion of artists such as Robert Smithson or Dennis Oppenheim was crucial. The approach these artists had to the environment was revolutionary. What they're known for historically added new meaning to the rest of the works in the show and vice versa. The conversation about the value of a photograph/documentation of sculpture versus sculpture itself was deeply in play here. This is a subtle notion within the larger context of the show, but ultimately intrinsic to the success of how the works converse with each other.

JG: Does a camera merely reflect, or does it alter what it captures?

CS: A camera is capable of doing both these things, but so is the human eye. WM

The closing of "City Limit" curated by Colin Snapp

with a special film screening
Sunday May 3 2015
12 - 6 PM

Rosa Barba
Cyprien Gaillard
Dennis Oppenheim
Phill Niblock

Deana Lawson, Jouvert, 2013, Pigment print, 40 7/8 x 51 1/2 inches (framed), Edition 1 of 3

Dennis Oppenheim, Radicality (Long Island, New York, red, yellow and green strontium nitrate flares. 15' x 100'), 1974 Color photography, 20 x 24 inches (framed)

"City Limit" Curated by Colin Snapp at The Journal Gallery

"City Limit" Curated by Colin Snapp at The Journal Gallery

"City Limit" Curated by Colin Snapp at The Journal Gallery

Jeff Grunthaner is a poet and art-writer based in Brooklyn. You can find his work in BOMB, artnet News, The Claudius App, Emergency INDEX, and elsewhere. His chap book THE TTTROUBLE WWITH SUUNDAAYS was recently published by Louisa Press.

• view all articles from this author

Here & Now Continental Drift
March, 2012

here & now

mono.blog

mono.gramm mono.graphic mono.kultur

Home

1-1

CONTINENTAL DRIFT

Last June, we talked to artists Colin Snapp and Daniel Turner about how their solo practices have evolved out of their collaborative outfit Jules Marquis. It seems they've been on quite a roll since then. Last September, Turner had a solo show at the Journal Gallery, where he showed site-specific works that expanded on his interest in the temporality of primal elements.

Tomorrow, the first half Snapp's new solo show opens at Journal. It will feature a massive still taken from his new video Continental Drift, as well as a series of photographs taken on disposable cameras. These works are a meditation on the tourist's position as perennial Other, confined to tour buses, opulent pools, and pristine beaches sanitized for Western consumption.

Screening next week at the gallery's new space, Continental Drift expands on these themes; the video was filmed entirely out of vehicles transporting Snapp from one tourist landmark to the next. The separation imposed by the tour buses' and taxis' windshields is palpable; through them, you glimpse a unknowable land and culture. But the work is not a comment on any culture war between the West and Islam, though filmed in a Muslim country, it highlights how travelers can never truly know the land they visit if they confine themselves to prepackaged tours and familiar-feeling hotels.

The video is accompanied by a dissonant soundtrack, composed from the artist's extensive archive of audio tracks, recordings made on site, and ambient noise from the video. As in Snapp's previous work, the effect is eerie, and uncannily perfect. The viewer is reminded both of the constructed reality of any guided trip abroad, and of the double falsehood of any visual record (so often video or photography) produced there.

Continental Drift
Opening March 6, 6-9 PM
through April 29, 2012
The Journal Gallery
168 North 1st Street
Brooklyn

Video stills and photography by Colin Snapp

Kennedy Colin Snapp
text ST. Dimitrakopoulos
Volume 1, Number 2, Summer 2014

COLIN SNAPP

The following interview was held in El Cajas, a Mexican restaurant in Los Angeles, in between Christmas songs, the sound of LA's radio stations scanning the Californian sky and the chattering affect of the orange rinds. Colin Snapp talked to me about the island he comes from, his encounter with David Turner and traveling, a notion that could turn up as his artistic practice, if not his entire personality.

Interview by ST. Dimitrakopoulos
Photography Adriana Giacinto

COLIN SNAPP

Black Collar, The Army, June 16, Seattle, after captured as a POW. What do you think is significant about it?

It is from the San Juan Islands, which is north of Seattle, but Seattle is the closest city. It is the first city I ever saw, but I haven't actually been there. So that is it in some ways. The San Juan Islands, which are in the Seattle metropolitan area? I was born and raised in Lopez, one of the two hundred San Juan Islands off the coast of Washington state. As a child, that was my home, nobody knows where it is. Lopez is a very beautiful island but it's quiet, cold and rainy. This island keeps many people away. So it's kind of isolated, especially in winter.

Imagine that there was no art scene there. So, not really, I guess what attracted me to art was just seeing everyone building their own boats and houses. Construction type of craft, that is a program I've always enjoyed.

What is Lopez Island's economic history?

During the winter, there are about two thousand people living there. In the summer, there are five or six thousand. They live in different ways, some people would have leaving the morning living in communes, and I think that those people probably already had some family money before they came. It was from a long history of agricultural and recreational activity. In some recent years, the full time island residents have become more dependent on tourism as a main source of income.

I think it would be very interesting to share the story about how your parents lived in the forest, with no electricity.

That was something that happened when I was eighteen or nineteen years old. At that time I was in San Francisco, initially just as an

COLIN SNAPP

PC Studio, 2013 Exhibition view, University, Boston.

pc 17
National Gallery, 2013 Exhibition view, The Avenue Gallery, New York.

COLIN SNAPP

PC Studio, 2013 Exhibition view, University, Boston.

pc 17
National Gallery, 2013 Exhibition view, The Avenue Gallery, New York.

COLIN SNAPP

PC Studio, 2013 Exhibition view, University, Boston.

pc 17
National Gallery, 2013 Exhibition view, The Avenue Gallery, New York.

COLIN SNAPP

PC Studio, 2013 Exhibition view, University, Boston.

pc 17
National Gallery, 2013 Exhibition view, The Avenue Gallery, New York.

COLIN SNAPP

PC Studio, 2013 Exhibition view, University, Boston.

pc 17
National Gallery, 2013 Exhibition view, The Avenue Gallery, New York.

COLIN SNAPP

PC Studio, 2013 Exhibition view, University, Boston.

pc 17
National Gallery, 2013 Exhibition view, The Avenue Gallery, New York.

timely

BY JACOB BROWN

Jules Marquis Art in America

Whether by filming an ode to NBC in a field or by having small-town Little Leaguers pace around a New York gallery and mutter “good game” to one another, Colin Snapp (left) and Daniel Turner frequently take aspects of globalized culture and consumerism and trickle them down to a rural level. The two New York-based artists, who recently began exhibiting collaborative work under the name Jules Marquis (julesmarquis.com), share a Greenpoint studio but regularly shuttle to southeast Virginia, where they’ve created a nonprofit art space on a corner of the Turner family farm. Named Jericho Ditch (jerichoditch.com), after a local logging canal, it serves as a venue and creative getaway for fellow artists. It also embodies the Jules Marquis ethos: from the outside, it’s a shed in a field; inside, it’s a big-city-gallery-style white box lit by symmetrical fluorescent tubes. Snapp and Turner have two shows opening in June: at Jericho Ditch and at Martos Gallery in New York.

The Journal Travel Journal, Basalt Colorado, Colin Snapp
Issue 32 2012

Photo: [unreadable]

Photo: [unreadable]

Your name: Colin Snapp Your occupation: Artist Your favorite activity: Hiking

Something you like: A constant dialogue Something you dislike: ~~Wasting time~~ Your defining characteristic: Run Stop

What most impresses you in art or your defining characteristic is: critical/abstract Your favorite artist: Basal tubes

Favorite word or phrase: Raincheck What aspect of your work is most important to you: Reduction

What do you believe the most important thing is: My wife Your secret hobby: ~~art~~ The first thing you think of in the morning: Dirty water

What you have always wanted to do and then not done: ~~Travel~~ Your worst decision: leaving Montana

Your favorite book or album: The Hobbit in Hawaii What made you become the person you are: My walking shoes

What would the child you are now think of the adult you have become: Sky Your greatest fear: Nostalgia

Photo: [unreadable]

Gallerist

Happenings:
This Week in
New York

Reviews of Current Shows

Like 7.7k
Follow

PREVIEWS

Colin Snapp Debuts Video at New Journal Gallery in Williamsburg on Saturday

BY ANDREW RUSSETH | 4/12/12 2:29PM

Like 0 Tweet 0 Share Pin It submit Email

Installation view of 'Leica Toll' by Colin Snapp. (Courtesy the Journal Gallery)

Has there ever been a stranger time for young artists? Their work may not be selling at quite the clip of 2007, we're told, but their opportunities are greater than ever. The risks they face are too. New galleries are opening regularly, and the established ones, sensing competition, are expanding. These art dealers need artists, and they have plenty to offer them.

The Journal Gallery, on North 1st Street in Williamsburg, is one of the many galleries ramping up. The exhibition venue of the luxe magazine The Journal, founded by Michael Nevin, has long been a sterling project space, a purveyor of handsome, modestly-sized shows by artists established elsewhere—Joe Bradley, Michael Williams, Rita Ackermann and the like—as well as a number of unknown artists well before their prime. Now it represents two superb young artists: Daniel Turner and Colin Snapp, who sometimes collaborate on a project called Jules Marquis. More artists may be on the way.

On Saturday, Mr. Snapp, 29, will unveil a quietly impressive video installation at a new Journal Gallery space on North 1st, a bit closer to the East River. It's in a former warehouse, with high ceilings and 3,500 square feet for artists to work with. The artist has lit it with a two-channel, 10-minute video spliced together from footage shot during a month-long trip to Morocco, called Leica Toll, and nothing more.

It was nearly pitch-black inside when we visited on a sunny Wednesday morning, along with Mr. Snapp, Mr. Nevin and the gallery's Vita Zaman, formerly of the Pace Gallery in New York and IBID in London, and it took some time for our eyes to adjust. As they did, deep, rich bells peeled out from speakers, sometimes gently, sometimes with a loud clang. Mr. Snapp recorded them in Morocco and then slowed them down. They echo through the empty warehouse and almost seem to make it vibrate.

Scenes from Morocco's roads appear on screen, which Mr. Snapp shot them through the window of taxis while riding along them. Huge tour buses slide slowly, silently past. A woman, shot in a rearview mirror, shields herself from the camera with her hand. There are expansive, empty desert landscapes. It never quite adheres to a documentary format—the clips are too quick, too disjointed—but instead balances between narration and raw imagery. The viewer becomes an intimate tourist in Mr. Snapp's world.

Over at the original Journal Gallery space, just across Bedford Avenue, Mr. Snapp has another show on view, through April 29. This one is called "Continental Drift," and it is almost as spare as his video installation—a few brightly lit snapshots from Morocco made on a disposable camera (sand rendered his other camera unusable) and a photo of that woman's hand, enlarged to an unsettling size. He projected the video onto the wall of his studio and took a photo. Skip the video installation down the street, and it will appear almost abstract, certainly illegible.

In the smaller gallery's office on Wednesday, Ms. Zaman was sitting with Journal Gallery co-founder Julia Dippelhofer. Why the new space? "These two amazing artists," Ms. Zaman answered, referring to Messrs. Snapp and Turner. "Their work is so major that it requires the space." Mr. Nevin had his eye on the space for a while. The gallery will renovate it over the summer and make a grand debut in September with a solo show by Mr. Turner.

Such large, Chelsea-sized spaces are still rare in Brooklyn, but Ms. Dippelhofer noted that there are a number of warehouses, some empty, in the area and all along North 1st. "This street just seems like it could be perfect," she said. "A lot of things are happening. You can really feel it."

Update, 5:30 p.m.: An earlier version of this article incorrectly attributed the closing quotation. It was spoken by Julia Dippelhofer. In addition, the article has been clarified to note that the gallery is expanding, not moving fully into the new space.

CONNECT WITH US

Sign up for our Newsletter SEND

Send an anonymous tip SEND

RECOMMENDED FOR YOU

Werner Herzog Doesn't Like Art, and Other Tales From the Whitney Biennial Op...

Took a Little Trip to Mexico: Collector Eugenio López Inaugurates Mexico C...

Promoted Content by Taboola

Popular on Gallerist

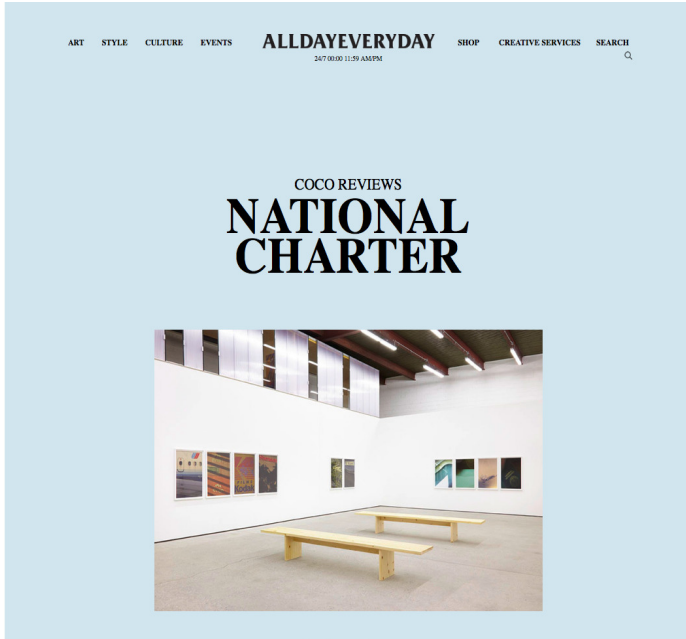

Ways Forward: What's Next for the Dia Art Foundation?

Philippe Goes to Hollywood: With Vergne In Place as New Director, L.A. MoCA Looks to the Future

Art History According to George Clooney

They Clicked With Investors—Now What? Who Will Win the Race to Sell Art Online?

Rene Ricard Has Died

By Coco Young

11 18 13

A recent solo exhibition at The Journal gallery, "National Charter" by Colin Snapp showcases a series of eighteen images, manifested as a subjective interpretation of America's corporate landscape. Having grown up in rural Washington State, now living and working in Los Angeles, "National Charter" embodies the nostalgic progression of the artist from country to city.

Through the lens of suburban aesthetics, Colin pays attention to materiality as he uproots a logo from its context, shedding light onto its harmonious and arbitrary set of colors and shapes, while detaching it from its original association. The extreme zoom of these images abstracts the object completely, and the viewer notices the essence of the object instead of its meaning — their materiality (and in some cases, the deterioration from weather and the passing of time) comes before the brand associations represented.

The object of study only loses significance momentarily, before it is re-contextualized — as the photographs are shot through the lens of a pair of sunglasses, or a tinted car window. Colin purposely leaves in some scenic clues, such as the framing of leaves, or the shadow of his own thumb, which permits the re-framing of these objects to be placed within his own subjectivity, while staying true to their suburban provenance.

Further, Colin's choice of scale is very important, as the severe zoom and the isolation of subject puts each of these objects on the same democratic plane. I particularly liked the pairing of E.S Phillips, 2013 and E.S Konica, 2013 — both of these images are of camera brand logos, rendering the pairing a self-conscious one. This democratic re-adjustment of branding strips the object of its original task and puts it back into its place — simple colors and shapes that are often seen by passersby's along a highway, or in this case, in an art gallery.

COCO REVIEWS
NATIONAL CHARTER

IMAGES - THE JOURNAL GALLERY

WRITER - COCO YOUNG

THE ISLANDS' WEEKLY

VOLUME 34, NUMBER 21 • JUNE 7, 2011

Art from rural to urban life

Local artist takes his work to the East Coast

Two men in flowing white gowns wave their arms as they stare across the ocean, a man moves in and out of focus in front of a bright background, rock climbers, a blue bus, the frame of a house left unfinished, a teepee, a family, a music festival.

These images with little or no sound are the work of a Lopezian artist and have been exhibited in New York City.

The artwork drew attention in January from the New York Times Style Magazine blog.

The featured artists, Colin Snapp, of Lopez Island and Daniel Turner of Virginia, show their work at a Greenpoint studio in New York City. They recently began exhibiting collaborative work under the name Jules Marquis.

According to the Times, the artists "take aspects of globalized culture and consumerism and trickle them down to a rural level."

You might ask, how exactly does one do this?

Snapp works primarily in the medium of video, which acts as a jumping point for stills, sculptural and performance art.

The New York Times blog cites the filming of an ode to NBC in a field (shown on page 6) and having small-town Little Leaguers pace around a New York gallery muttering "good game" to one another, as an example of the Jules Marquis ethos.

Photo/ Jules Marquis

The Jericho Ditch art space and gallery..

"The idea behind these works is simple and ties into the fact that both of us [Turner and I] have spent our lives divided between rural locations and major cities," Snapp said.

Or take the nonprofit art gallery Turner and Snapp have created, which resembles a big-city-gallery on the inside, but on the outside it's a shed in a field in rural Virginia.

"Originally the space was used as his [Turner's] studio," Snapp said. "The transformation from studio to gallery was very organic and was instigated out of our frustration towards the presentation of contemporary art."

The space named Jericho Ditch, after a local logging canal, gives artists living in New York or abroad a rural setting that city living can't provide.

The Lopezian artist explains his work process as relying heavily on intuition and shooting lots of video.

SEE LOCAL ARTIST. PAGE 6

here & now

mono.blog

mono.gramm mono.graphie mono.kultur

Home

COLIN SNAPP / DANIEL TURNER

It makes sense that I would discover the work of Daniel Turner and Colin Snapp while haphazardly clicking through VVORK. Their ongoing collaboration, Jules Marquis, encapsulates the omnivorous taste of that lo-fi curatorial forum. Working with and through sculpture, film, performance, installation, appropriation, and many other media, Jules Marquis has created a body of work that is a balance of opposites; political and disengaged, holistic and site-specific, linear and circular. Their piece Delta performance JFK to LGA is a case in point. A flight between JFK and LGA, at a cost of about $500, the work can be read as sharp critique of consumerist waste. Or perhaps it is a simple gesture that recalls the almost universal cultural experience of an airplane's non-space. Or it is simply a journey that ends nowhere.

While Colin and Daniel also have two very distinct solo practices, and exhibit often on their own, their new show at Martos Gallery in Chelsea marks the first time they will show their solo work together. I recently sat down with the two of them in their Greenpoint studio to watch some videos and discuss their work.

You have collaborated together under the names Cornrow Rider and Jules Marquis for over ten years. What made you decide to exhibit your solo work together?

It was about timing, our entire practice is about timing.

Colin, your films often document what might be called found, everyday performance; in Maybelline, you focus in on the repeated gestures of rock climbers, and in Sylvania on the prostrations of two men who seem to be worshipping the ocean. Do you set out to film these occurrences? What is your interest in them, as opposed to literal, fictional, or reenacted performance?

The line between documentary and performance is at the core of my work. Each video has its own story. In the case of Maybelline I did travel to Joshua Tree to film rock climbers, beyond that nothing was planned. Sylvania, on the other hand, was completely spontaneous. The improvisational aspects of video is something that has always interested me. I walk a lot, often up to 30 miles a day. Many of these video works are my attempt to make use of these travels.

Colin, one of the most interesting aspects of your video work is the interplay between sound and image. Some pieces feature diegetic sound – in Maybelline, the sound of carabiner against rock, for instance. In other films, however, you create incongruous, and uncannily apt, pairings – soothing images of waves with sitar music, or a tightly focused image of a carnival ride accompanied by classical music. Can you talk about what you feel this different aesthetic strategies offer? For the mentioned works I made those decisions in post production. Whatever worked with the footage best I went with, whether that was found music or a field recording. Recently I have been focusing more on the audio aspects of my practice. I'm working on a new series in which I use the field recordings as a jumping off point for the videos.

Daniel, your work seems to explore an ephemeral materiality, using very basic, almost elemental substances – soot, aluminum, tar, rust – that leave fleeting marks on the surface they stain, and whose character changes over time. Your work in this show consists of iron oxide \(rust\) on the floor of the gallery. Could you talk about your interest in temporality and material, in these marks of change or decay?

I've always had an infinity of times mark upon a given surface. I started out painting, using materials such as liquid aluminum, tar, and kerosene, on large canvas tarps. After time the tarps begin to sag, the stretcher bars begin to buckle, the paintings leaked. Operating pictorially began to make little sense to me, yet the actual material I was painting with was of interest. On the steel wool rubbings: The general conversation around steel, is one of its history and weight. Yet the steel rubbings are virtually weightless, and its this dialogue that I am interested in. Present yet simultaneously absent.

The work of Jules Marquis is very different than either of your solo practices. It draws on the legacies of appropriation art, as with Rwanda, or on post-studio performance, in the case of Delta performance JFK to LGA. What do you feel collaborative practice allows you to explore that solo practice can't, and vice versa?

Collaboration allows for one to venture into other arenas that go generally untapped. It gives you a tremendous amount of perspective on your own practice while allowing to explore another. One becomes almost bilingual through the integration of once separate mediums.

Colin Snapp / Daniel Turner

June 30th – July 29th, 2011

Martos Gallery
540 W 29th Street
New York, NY 10001

Go Back To Home

WOMEN'S FASHION

MEN'S FASHION

DESIGN

TRAVEL

FOOD

CULTURE

VIDEO

Now Showing | Daniel Turner and Colin Snapp

CULTURE | By JACOB BROWN | JUNE 29, 2011, 4:00 PM

'Meridian' by Colin Snapp.

< 1 | 2 | 3 | 4 | 5 | 6 >

The boys of Jules Marquis are back. The artists Daniel Turner and Colin Snapp have a joint show opening tomorrow at the Martos Gallery in New York. According to Snapp, "The works aim to confront the paradox of the current age by illuminating the process in which regional economies, societies and cultures have become integrated through a globe-spanning network of exchange." They accomplish this, in part, through an aggressive approach to mixing mediums, which vary from large-scale video stills to rust smears on the gallery floor. In the slide show above, Snapp and Turner offer us a preview of sorts: two images of new work making their debut tomorrow, followed by four key past works they feel helped them arrive at their current artistic fascinations.

"Colin Snapp / Daniel Turner," Martos Gallery, 540 West 29th Street; (212) 560-0670; martosgalleries.com.

SEARCH

« PREVIOUS
Andy Walking

NEXT »
Paris Top 5 | Lanvin

T'S TOP STORIES

Featured | Most Popular

1. Three's a Trend | Luxe Sweatpants
2. Listen Up | Singer-Songwriter Jenny Lewis's Perfect New Single for 'Girls'
3. Food Matters | Hot Dog!
4. Art Matters | For Adults Only
5. The Moment | Back to the Land

MAGAZINE

THE HOLIDAY ISSUE »

In T's final issue of the year, we get into the festive mood of the season and pay tribute to the creative genius of Rei Kawakubo, the enduring allure of iconic old restaurants, the seduction of Tangier and more. See all stories from the issue >>

All Past Issues »

GALERIE ALLEN

59 rue de Dunkerque
75009 Paris France
+33 (0)1 45 26 92 33
contact@galerieallen.com
galerieallen.com

For any further information please contact:
pour plus d'informations veuillez contacter :

Joseph Allen Shea
+33 (0)1 45 26 92 33
joseph@galerieallen.com

galerieallen.com